CHAPTER VII.
ONCE again, just as the dusk was gathering, Eunice lingered by the fence near the spring house. The girl's heart was on fire this evening, and she felt that she would stifle or shriek if she went into the house and shut herself within those dreary whitewashed walls. Here, the open air, the cool breeze deep, today her pent up feelings had reached the high water mark, and tonight they must have outlet or she must suffocate.

What was the meaning, she was asking herself in bewilderment, of this mingled ecstasy and woe, which were now her daily lot? Why should she go so long ago it seemed, though in reality it was only three weeks ago that he—the man from the city—had come among them? Her heart had been dormant, incapable of feeling aught of pain or pleasure? And now—to the tips of her fingers was she tingling with life, with burning emotions which stilled and pained, yet gave her the first taste of joy she had never known. For the first time in her memory the heavy loneliness in which she had always lived seemed lifted. Something in her which had always been starved was fed. It had become worth while to rise up in the morning and go through with her tasks. The days palpitated now and throbbed. There were no longer the dull, dead days that had been. There was always the possibility of a word or act of kindness from him. Never before in her life had she known kindness, but she had been kind to her. He had tried to shield her from her foster father's anger and had then hidden the newspaper for her. He had helped her when he saw her burdened with heavy buckets of milk. He had several times spoken to her with a friendly interest.

These episodes, entirely trifling in themselves, appeared large and luminous to this girl, accustomed only to slights. Her imagination, fired by his utter difference from any one she had ever before seen, made of him a creature whose least word or act was weighted with significance. Her ardent and passionate interest in everything about him—his voice, his accent so strange to her ears, the movements of his white hands forever busy with his hands, the way he sat or walked or stood or looked—all that he did or uttered was fascinating. Intoxicated. And today her feelings had reached a climax of intensity which had amazed herself. It had come upon her when she had seen him return from his afternoon work. There was the privilege of looking upon him for hours together, of hearing the sound of his voice, of drinking in his thoughts about things (how happy her own mind was to read all his thoughts and feelings, and—oh, bitterness!—they had all three come upon her when, weary and soiled, she was awaking, and, overladen, she was awkwardly tugging her heavy buckets across the garden. She had fauced his snowy hands had shrunk from touching her soiled ones as he took the buckets from her. The overwhelming sense of her own inferiority in the face of the contrast between her own and the beauty of the man followed by a passion of toward rebellion that had left her physically exhausted. It had not yet spent itself as just now she stood in the dusk by the spring house fence. Her heart burned within her with a feeling that she did not understand, for the passion of jealousy was to her as unknown as the passion of love. Her own blinding, consuming emotions were appalling to herself in their utter strangeness and.

He had said that he wished to assume a farmhand's disguise because he didn't want to associate with farm hands. Why, then, was he spending whole afternoons with him? Was he repaying him of his what? And, even though she was not a mere farmhand, could not he find to find happiness in being with him, for farmhand or gentleman, he was himself.

The young ladies appeared to her very stupid not to recognize that he was not a farmhand. To be sure, they probably did not know many farm hands and so did not know how impossible it was, but they had only to compare him with Abe and his father to see the absurdity of it.

This evening, for the first time since he had come to the farm, she felt to wondering in a vague, indistinct way what was his mood, his mood of herself, whom he saw only at her drudgery, treated slightly by every one, always looking backward at the working clothes, yet before him even to coward. That day he had found her with the newspaper he had evidently supposed that her father was working while he had been caused by her fear of being caught in the act of disobeying her foster father. She had read the book of half a dozen times, and it had served to increase her agony of embarrassment before him. Then his poverty concealed mockery at her not knowing about that great man, Andrew Carnegie—how that had mortified her! And now to behold the effect of her own unconsciousness here were those well dressed, well looking, well educated, and worldly, well young ladies daily before her eyes. Oh, if only she could creep into a corner and remain unseen while still not losing the bliss of seeing him! But then, there was the ecstasy of having him occasionally speak to her. The few dozen words he had spoken to her in the time he had been with them were graven deep in her heart. Why should he seek to talk to her now and then if he utterly despised her—be who at first had meant to avoid even those girls from the town by assuming a farmhand's garb? He never talked to Ollie. Why did he speak to her? True, their few encounters had been quite accidental. "He had not sought her out. Perhaps he took the trouble to speak kindly to her because he was sorry for one whom every one else half despised."

Her thoughts were interrupted by the sound of approaching footsteps and voices. "The two young ladies were coming toward her across the grass plot."

"Eunice!" cried Daisy when at a few yards distant. "Do you know where Pete is? I want to hire him to take us for a drive."

Eunice's heart beat thick in her breast. To see these pretty girls, their fair bodies daintily clad, their white hands bearing so deftly marks of rough work, their care free spirits bright with happiness—to look on and see them drive off into the summer twilight with him—she could not bear that this evening!

"Where is he?" repeated Daisy. "I'm going to find him. If I have to search all over the farm. It's such a dandy evening for a drive!"

"Did you look up in the north cornfield?" Eunice asked, not moving up. "Way up in that north cornfield?" cried Daisy in consternation.

"You are sure he is there, Eunice?" asked Georgina.

"It would be well for you to look there, the girl steadily replied. "What proof can you offer that he's there, Eunice?" demanded Daisy. "I don't want to chase up there for nothing."

"If you have looked every place else, then the only place he can be is here. That seems reasonable," Daisy granted. "Is he moving corn up there tonight?"

"Yes," Eunice was able to answer truthfully.

"Then what is he doing?"

"He may possibly be looking to see how the corn is coming on, but," she hastily added, "can't prove it."

"Well," sighed Daisy, "come on, Georgie. We'll have to skate if we're going to get a drive tonight."

They went away, and Eunice was left alone to face her own chaotic thoughts.

"What led you to think I was up in the north cornfield?"

thoughts. She leaned her elbows on the fence and pressed her palms against her burning cheeks to cool them. The sunset, painting rich reds and oranges to her as she gazed out over the fields to the crimson horizon to mirror her own warm passionate heart.

She had lied to those young ladies! Not in actual words, but the impression she had given was false. Why had she done it? What good could it do her? And suppose he knew! A wave of shame enveloped her. The hands supporting her cheeks covered her eyes as though to shut out from her sight the disgraceful self she beheld. Could she ever look at him again after this?

"What led you to think I was up in the north cornfield?"

Out of the stillness and dimness of the evening a voice close beside her asked the question in a low, soft tone. She did not uncover her eyes, she did not move. He was there beside her! He had overheard her telling those girls the question—his voice! The north cornfield, a quarter of a mile away! He had been standing, no doubt, just within the spring house and had heard her utter those lies. He had surely recognized that they were lies, though her spoken words had been literally untrue.

"I didn't tell them you were there," she faintly answered.

"Why, you sent them up there to find me, didn't you?" he asked, his tone purred.

"Yes," she confessed in a guilty child.

"Well, didn't you think I was there? She shook her head.

"You didn't? Then why in thunder did you make them think I was?"

"Because—that's where I knew you wouldn't be. The words seemed dragged from her against her will.

He appeared to ponder over it a bit. What he really was thinking was that perhaps he had now stumbled upon the solution of the mystery of this maiden. To offer as an explanation of her having sent those girls to look for him in the north cornfield that she knew that's where he wouldn't be—evidently she was not quite right in her mind.

But another idea occurred to him. "Ah!" he said. "You wanted to give them a false scent, knowing that I prefer to keep to myself."

It was a beautiful explanation. For a moment she half believed that was why she had sent them to the north cornfield—to protect him from their unwelcome society. Anyway, it was infinitely comforting to have him think so, instead of knowing her real reason. What was her real reason? She could not have defined it, even to herself.

He seemed waiting to hear her confirm or deny his surmise. But she did not speak.

"It was very kind of you," he presently added, "to want to oblige me."

Her face burned hotter. She had an impulse to turn to him and undeceive him—to tell him the disgraceful truth. But what was the truth? Why had she wished to keep him away from the two girls?

It was her entire ignorance of life that made it so impossible for her to understand her own quite primitive emotions.

"You are sure he is there, Eunice?" asked Georgina.

"It would be well for you to look there, the girl steadily replied. "What proof can you offer that he's there, Eunice?" demanded Daisy. "I don't want to chase up there for nothing."

More Railways Than Britain.
The mileage of railways in actual operation in Canada during 1920, was increased 1,135, making 24,104 miles in operation, exceeding the mileage of Great Britain and Ireland by 1,000.

Railway capital in Canada now amounts to $1,308,614,616, of which $47,534,467 in stocks and $660,946,769 in bonds. This is a total increase during the year of $39,138,603. The number of passengers carried were 28,633,309 as against 24,044,962 in 1919. The total passenger revenue being $45,223,336, as compared with $44,544,136 in 1919. The carrying of 60,445,330 tons of freight represented an increase of 3,711,081, and the revenue, $26,714,752, was a gain of $1,066,127.

There were 605 killed and 3,166 injured, on the railways. Thirty-six of the killed and 261 of the injured during 1920 were passengers. There are 19,272 highway crossings in Canada. Of these 1,619 are protected, 187 by gates, 300 by overhead bridges, 379 by subways, 116 by bells, and 117 by watchmen.

The total mileage of electric railways—earnings were $14,824,536. Sixty-eight persons were killed and 3,138 injured.

Canada's Carrying Trade.
Up to the close of navigation 38,964,307 bushels of wheat had been sent from the Northwest through Canadian ports and 18,441,249 through the United States port. The completion of the N.T.R. will more and more tend to save this traffic for Canada.

The general law of evolution is from the useful and practical into the ideal and beautiful. This seems to be reversed in the case of the city and the banana. The banana is really a developed tropical fruit from which the seeds have been eliminated and the fruit greatly exalted.

CANADIANS DID WELL

MOST OF THE DOMINION'S CANDIDATES WON IN BRITAIN.

The Election of "Fighting Joe" Martin of Vancouver will bring satisfaction to his many friends.

Greenwood seems sure of a seat if Liberals win. J. Allen Baker's Election is Also Popular.

Canadians have done well in British politics, and the success of "Fighting Joe" Martin in East St. Paul was but good news to thousands of his fellow countrymen. He was born at Milton, Ont., in 1852, and educated at Michigan State Normal School and the Provincial Normal School, Toronto.

He was subsequently passing his second year's examination in arts at Toronto University. After teaching school in Ottawa, he removed to Manitoba, where he was elected to the bar of that province in 1882. A Liberal in politics, he was first returned as an independent candidate to the Manitoba Legislature in 1885, holding the seat for nine years. In 1893 he was returned to the Dominion Parliament as member for Winnipeg, but in the general election of 1896 he was defeated. In 1906 he was elected to the House, moved to British Columbia and opened a law practice, but soon mixed with politics.

He was elected to the House of Commons in 1907, and served as an officer in the militia. He was elected to the House of Commons in 1907, and served as an officer in the militia. He was elected to the House of Commons in 1907, and served as an officer in the militia.

Now we read that in Colorado a minister has lost his job because he wore striped socks. He was fortunate in having socks, if they striped ones.

The C. P. R., propose spending $4,000,000 on improvements throughout Alberta this year. In the list of towns that are to have new stations Blairmore is included also Hillcrest, Lundbreck, Brockton, Cowley and McGillivray.

Two miners have been arrested at Michel on suspicion of being implicated in the hold-up of the Triton-Wood Company's clerks. It may be that the miners were held up on previous occasions by the same firm and were trying to break even.

The question of a water supply for the village should receive serious attention from the business men of our village. At present the supply consists of three or four barrels on a sled, which would not be very effective should a fire occur.

As has been intimated in some papers that other coal companies are going to insist on getting the reduction that the Hillcrest company forced on their miners last summer. If this should be so it would be policy to put the Hillcrest mine on the "hammer."

The District Ledger is now under new management and a great improvement has taken place in the general make-up of that paper since the change. It is to be regretted that the change did not take place long ago.

Some months ago the attention of the C.P.R. authorities was called to the dangerous condition of our station platform. Up to date no action has been taken to safeguard the lives of those who travel on their lines.

The Homers Times of recent date stated that the coal washing plant being erected at the Homer mines was the only one in the Pass. If Mr. Editor should wander down to the works of the West Canadian Collieries Co., at Lille, he would see a large coal washing plant which has been in operation for years. At Lille all coal is washed that is used for making coke. This is the reason why there is such great demand for the Lille product throughout the metalliferous districts of Montana and the boundary country and we hope the Homer product will have the same demand in the western smelting industries. But when the Times lays claim to having the first and only coal washing plant in the Pass, we object.

The situation in regard to the dog nuisance is causing considerable discussion around the town. The council have put out notices that all dogs will be destroyed if they are not tied up. But there are a large number running around the streets and they are a great source of danger. Since the outbreak of this disease, the local authorities have done everything possible to isolate those infected and to prevent any person coming in contact with them. However, in the first place, and during the first few days, the dogs belonging to those infected were allowed to ramble at will around town and there was no one who knew what action to take. The Provincial authorities were wired to and a representative of the department came to town and gave the information that the village council constituted the board of health and it was their duty to destroy any or all dogs that were found in that immediate vicinity. The council acting on above information appointed an officer to patrol that section of the village where the patients were isolated. During the day he destroyed several dogs and protests are coming in rapidly from those whose dogs are destroyed. Every person should take warning and keep their dogs tied up, for if they are allowed to follow their owners around the street and mingle with other hounds, they are very liable to carry germs to different places in town. Some people are of the opinion that they can allow their dogs and live stock to ramble at will through the streets of the village and especially so if the village council issue an order forbidding the same to be done. All dogs should be tied up until the present scare is over and thus assist the village officers in keeping the town from being quarantined.

A Minister's Hose Belong to Himself

Calgary divides appear to be perplexed about the case of Rev. B. P. Turner, of Lajarra, Col., who according to telegraphic advice, has been dismissed by his congregation because he wore socks and shirts that were too "loud." The incident is so unusual that local ministers of the gospel do not hardly know what to make out of it. Mr. H. R. Gale, the evangelist, appeared to have the clearest opinion on the subject. When asked to express himself he said:

"Of course it is not for me to dictate what kind of socks a minister should wear, but I should say he should clothe himself with suitable regard for the dignity of his calling. However, I don't see what matter it makes whether a minister's socks are black, blue, white, yellow, green or heliotrope, striped vertically or horizontally, whether they are silk or cotton, or cost 15 cents or 75 cents, as long as the man who wears them does not show them off to the congregation. I should say that a minister has a perfect right to wear any kind of socks he wants, as long as he does not make himself too conspicuous."

Rev. A. G. Baker said: "I never read the dispatch myself, but my opinion would be that the fact that this particular minister wore socks that were too loud, was only one of the reasons for his dismissal. Perhaps the dispatch did not give all the reasons. The man's loud clothes were probably only an indication that he was empty headed or too gay or faulty in some other more serious particular. As far as our church is concerned, the greatest liberty is allowed all the members as well as the clergy, and there is no rule regulating the kind of socks or shirts a minister should wear."

Rev. A. W. Coone: "It does not appear to be anything serious. If the minister had appeared in a nightgown for instance, it would have been worthy of attention. A man should not be judged by what he wears. Of course a minister should wear clothes becoming to his calling, but there are no hard and fast rules governing the matter."

When Rev. G. W. Kirby was asked to express an opinion he answered as follows: "Ask Mrs. Kirby." Mrs. Kirby, however, was just as noncommittal, and Mrs. Sycamore, wife of Rev. J. C. Sycamore, said she would have to give the matter more careful consideration before venturing an opinion. Calgary Albertan.
